A Protection

By SADIE OLCOTT

"Colonel Eldridge."

"Well?"

"I think I shall have to leave the fort. There are too many young officers here who have nothing to do but flirt, and they make a girl's life intolerable."

"But you don't have to flirt with them if you don't wish to do so."

"They are so persistent. There's Mr. Wheeler, just out of West Point with nothing but his pay as second lieutenant and nothing with which to occupy himself but to cultivate his incipient mustache. He has been bothering me to become engaged to him. I think you, as commandant of the post, should issue an order against flirting."

"And if the penalty of the order is transgressed?"

"Twelve hours in the guardhouse."

"Very well. Consider the order issued. Go to the guardhouse."

"I? I am not flirting. I assure you I'm in earnest."

She looked at the colonel, a handsome bachelor of forty, with a pair of beautiful eyes in a way that puzzled him.

"I have a mind to order you out of the garrison," he said. "You have bewitched these young officers so as to render them useless as soldiers, and I shall get no service out of them till you are gone."

"Do sit down and let us talk it over. I think I can prove to you that I am not a flirt."

"Well, go on."

"Seriously, Mr. Wheeler must be headed off or—"

"He'll blow out his brains?"

"How could he do that when?"

"He hasn't any?"

"Listen to me. I see a way to settle the matter with him."

"And the rest of them?"

"Will you please cease to interrupt me?"

"Proceed."

"When a girl is once engaged she is let alone. Now, I wish to be engaged."

"Oh, you do! For how long?"

"That depends. My first object is to get rid of this clamor. I can't marry all these young men, and if I engage myself to one of them all the rest will quarrel over the matter. Now, if I engage myself to their commanding officer it will be very different. No one of them will have been preferred to the other."

"What a brain you have in that pretty head of yours! Are you sure they'll not all mutiny?"

"How ridiculous!"

"I'm at your service. But I warn you you may find it harder to get rid of me than Wheeler."

"Oh, I'm not afraid of that."

"You mean, I suppose, that being an old fogey I'll do for a buffer and when no longer needed will be retired."

"You go too fast. It will be time enough to talk about crossing a bridge when we get to it."

"Will you announce our engagement?"

"There you are again—trying to cross a bridge we haven't reached."

"But I thought you said you wished to be engaged to me for protection. What protection will it be if we keep the engagement a secret?"

"What does an engagement involve?"

"Kissing privileges."

"There is something that comes before that."

"What? Eh, oh, I see—a proposal."

"Certainly."

"Will you do me the honor to be my wife?"

"Not on such a proposal as that."

"What kind of a proposal would you like?"

"One with some feeling in it."

"Having received a great many of them, perhaps you will tell me the most attractive way to proceed."

"The suitor, sitting beside the lady as you are sitting, takes her left hand in his."

The colonel did as instructed, using his right hand.

"Not that hand; the other!"

"Why so?"

"The right hand must be free."

The colonel used his left hand.

"Then he tells his story in his own way."

"You are the loveliest little humbug in the world. I love you desperately and have loved you desperately ever since you came to the garrison, but I never dreamed that you would consider an old fellow like me for a moment, especially when—"

"Now you see why you should keep your right hand free," she interrupted as he placed it on her waist.

"All these young chaps are mad about you."

"That's the way I supposed you felt about it. Now the privilege you spoke of comes in."

The colonel took advantage of the privilege and the young lady remarked that that was not essential to the original plan, whereupon the colonel exclaimed, "Original plan be hanged!"

The colonel was right about the mutiny, save that it was a social mutiny only. Half a dozen subalterns ground their teeth and wondered what a girl could see in a man old enough to be her father. However, the lady's engagement to the commandant served as ample protection even from Mr. Wheeler, though he was so badly hit that he put in an application for transfer.
